Some simply like a combination of Photoshop and Fireworks. It depends on your needs, but just make sure you understand that Fireworks will not save PSDs in your layered format and that you can't edit a PSD directly in Fireworks. More experienced photographers often use any combination of the following tools: Photoshop: The most popular editing tool used by photographers. Lightroom: A powerful Adobe photo management tool that you can use to prepare, organize, and edit your images. Fireworks: An extremely popular vector graphics tool often used with Photoshop. Photomerge: A tool that enables you to combine two or more images. Lab: A tool for changing the color of an image. ImageReady: A commercial brand of software used to create and print CDs and DVDs. It's often used as a companion to Photoshop. Photoshop Elements: A relatively inexpensive alternative to Photoshop, which enables you to make basic adjustments to images. PhotoAcute: A desktop-based photo editing program that lets you create digital photo prints from your RAW and JPEG files. RawTherapee: A powerful RAW (raw digital) image processing tool. The GIMP: The open-source alternative to Photoshop. The more you know about each of these tools, the more you can use them to create different styles of prints. If you are a commercial photographer, you may want to consider adding a tool such as Photoshop Elements, Adobe's lower-priced editing tool, or PhotoAcute, a professional photo printer that lets you print from a digital image. Or, if you plan to do a lot of printing, you may want to consider Silver Efex Pro. Silver Efex Pro is a version of Photoshop with advanced photo-editing tools designed to handle high-volume printing. Q: High Availability and Heartbeat Architecture I am looking at the various solutions to provide high availability and I can't help but notice how similar heartbeat is to the CAP theorem. Does anyone know of any examples of a heartbeat style solution that is architected to go beyond CAP? A: Well CAP isn't really a high availability architecture. The CAP theorem says that consistent availability can't be achieved in a distributed system with strict quorum requirements. So the answer to the first part of your question is that I don't know of any example of such a system. As to the second part of your question, there is nothing in heartbeat that says it is a solution to the CAP theorem. Again the only thing I could find is that it achieves consensus-based linearizability, but that seems like a weak form of consistency (but still better than weak consistency). So perhaps I misunderstood the question. Q: Scrapy Error: RSS Feed Configuration is missing setting i18n.send_params I'd like to use a JSON feed instead of the default RSS feed.
