But the amount you'll save on other loan terms can be worth your time. "Understand that it's going to cost you, but that you're ultimately going to save money on your other loan terms," Marshall says. Even though you're not putting as much money down as you might be putting on other loans, Marshall says, it's still worth your time to shop for the lowest rate on your balance transfer. "If you're going to have to pay 10 or 15 percent, it makes sense to pay that rate," he says. To save money on other loans, you can consider a fixed-rate loan, which will give you a fixed payment for the life of the loan. But if you're looking for higher, variable payments, a balance transfer can give you another loan feature, a variable rate, at the same time. Once the rate you're getting from the balance transfer is set, it'll be a fixed rate on your other loans, so you might have to go through the credit application process twice. But that, Marshall says, is part of what makes balance transfers so convenient. If you take out your other loan, you'll need to do the credit application again, and you'll likely need to disclose your pre-existing debt when the application is first submitted. When you have a balance transfer with a fee, you'll have to pay that fee upfront, so you could be stuck with extra interest on your other loans if you don't pay off your debt fast enough. balance transfer, meaning to pay for a loan entirely with a balance transfer payment at a lower interest rate.
