What's new:

Elite: Special Operation II Heart of the Gladow The sky is a swirling vortex of colors, and every atom in the galaxy is swirling around it. Something like the fabric of reality is being torn by the sheer power of the void, and something bloody is being left behind, those bloody tendrils of energy, they spread into a million droplets of energy. They sparkle in the brighter patches of the stellar void, and throb as they float through the dark, constraining expanses of space, crashing into other crystal fragments that want to hitch a ride through the hard vacuum of space. These crystal clusters fly for ages, and eventually they collide with something else. They absorb it all without missing a beat. Nothing in the galaxy can resist them. They then collide with more crystals, and more crystals, and more crystals. First those fragments start to deform, then they lose their integrity, then they burst into flame, leaving tattered and blackened shards. They become some sort of black fluid, they become crystalline structures, they become more than crystals - they become monstrous structures. Some of the shards are huge, some of them are vast, one is so huge that it is visible to the naked eye, and every planet is now caught up in the grasp of this crystal maelstrom. The shards in the center of the void start to join together, their rendezvous happens on a planet that is hidden behind an asteroid belt. They clump together, and their bright star begins to glow from within. It shines brightest in the center, and sparks out to the sizes they have grown to, and those sparks collide with other shards that are close by. The entire planet changes shape, from still into a living being. A giant lumps starts to move, it starts to grow. It grows into a giant, gravity-shaped rock, the size of a small moon. The sun has a cold it wants to give to the planet. It has no need to stay here any longer, a planet that is filled with the energy of entropy, of death, will soon belong to it. It will obey the laws of thermodynamics, it will be generated from the combined heat of the random motions of gases in space. Eventually it will be over, it will have absorbed everything that the sun could have had, and it will join the millions of other stars that are slowly fading from our universe. The crystal shards grow, and grow. One giant crystal becomes a huge, eye-shaped object
