Clinical and epidemiologic considerations in the study of alcohol use. The clinical and epidemiologic aspects of the study of alcohol use and abuse are reviewed. The diagnostic categories and descriptions used in the medical literature, and the kinds of questions addressed by researchers are analyzed. In medical research, study subjects are usually classified as either alcohol abusers or nonabusers, and their histories are related in terms of possible alcoholism. Clinicians may be interested in the epidemiology of acute alcoholic intoxication, chronic alcoholism, chronic "hangover" syndrome, alcohol withdrawal, and various specific diseases that may be associated with alcohol use. Generally, researchers differ from clinicians in terms of the types of questions they ask. Clinicians seek to identify individuals with alcohol-related problems, to diagnose these problems, and to estimate the prevalence of each diagnosis. Research scientists are primarily interested in identifying correlations and in identifying variables that appear to mediate observed clinical and epidemiologic phenomena. This article discusses how the clinical and epidemiologic perspectives may be applied to investigate alcohol-related problems.Thesis by Dr. Kevin Cull Location Abstract The UK plays a significant role in both global and EU trade. With the UK contributing over 25% of the EU's overseas trade it can be argued that the UK has benefited more from EU membership than the reverse. Moreover, the economy of the UK has seen a strong performance over the last two years (as the UK reformed its economy) and it is this robust performance that has led to some opposition to UK membership of the EU. In contrast, the EU has had a stagnant performance and as such, membership of the UK seems to bring real benefits. This is all the more impressive when the UK joins a core of countries that are the "Club Med" of the EU where access to the single market is unrestricted. In this thesis it is argued that to balance the benefits and negatives of membership of the EU the UK needs to re-strengthen its "national market" and minimise the move to international markets (in the form of the single market). A major point made by the EU in the negotiations on Brexit is that they need more political control of the British people. Indeed, the introduction of article 50 negates the sovereignty of the British people. In the conclusion, the implementation of the WTO will act as a benchmark against which to measure the success of the UK's transition to globalised trade. Show HN: The first self-hosted platform
