Overexpression of cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) has been associated with various pathological conditions and is a leading indication for the use of NSAIDs as the gold standard for treatment of pain and inflammation. Indomethacin is one of the most commonly used NSAIDs. In this study, we showed the effects of indomethacin on differentiation, apoptosis and expression of cyclooxygenase-2 (COX-2) in human amniotic membrane (HAM) cells. HAM cells were treated with various concentrations of indomethacin (0--12.5 μ M) for 0--72 h, and then the cell viability was examined by MTT assay. Osteoblastic differentiation of HAM cells was also examined by ALP staining after culturing the cells with different concentrations of indomethacin (0--12.5 μ M) for 21 days. Cells were also treated with 0--12.5 μ M indomethacin in 12.5 μ M sodium butyrate (NaB). And the expression of COX-2 was examined by western blotting. The MTT assay showed that the viability of the HAM cells was not significantly affected by the indomethacin treatment. The ALP staining demonstrated that indomethacin inhibited osteoblastic differentiation of the HAM cells in a dose-dependent manner. The western blotting also showed that the expression of COX-2 was reduced in a dose-dependent

Dismantling the Socialist State in Venezuela – Part 1 09 Jun 2017

Establishing a genuinely free market economy is one of the key objectives of the Trump administration in Venezuela. Since its hyperinflationary crisis, Venezuela's socialist regime has continued to use socialist-like policies such as price controls and export controls to keep prices low, generate foreign exchange to pay for oil imports and supply much-needed hard currency to the regime. Unfortunately, this has resulted in hyperinflation, which has rendered the country's currency, the Bolivar, useless. While the Venezuelan government has slowed the pace of hyperinflation by increasing the price of imported goods and stopping many of its previous welfare programs, the Chavez regime's economy has continued to plummet. According to the IMF, Venezuela's economy shrank 7.6% in the first quarter of 2017 alone, the worst performance for any economy in the Latin American region in the first quarter of a year since the economic crisis in Venezuela began. "The Venezuelan economy shrank more in the first quarter of 2017 than at any other time in the decade under Hugo Chávez," And with inflation projected to hit an estimated 10,000% in the coming year, economic activity in the country has completely collapsed. Hyperinflation has devastated much of the country's economy, which has left a majority of Venezuelans with food and basic necessities while the government continues to spend over US$50 billion per year on imported goods. Meanwhile, a large proportion of Venezuela's oil exports go towards paying off debts incurred by the regime during its failed socialist-inspired attempts to control its economy. It's no wonder that a recent survey found that over 50% of Venezuelans want their government to reduce and eventually eliminate the price controls and subsidies that have devastated their economy. Given Venezuela's horrific track record when it comes to economic management, the Trump administration has rightly opted to take a more aggressive approach to change the direction of the Venezuelan economy. On February 15, the U.S. government announced sanctions against the people
