2. Description of the Related Art A conventional electronic catalog (hereinafter, called "catalog") is created based on an input of a plurality of sellers' (hereinafter, referred to as "merchants") names, catalog information, descriptions of products, costs and the like. Catalog creation is performed based on the data which are input by the respective sellers. For example, sellers who have a contract to supply a sales territory are selected, and catalog information is input by the selected sellers. A sales area is set based on the input catalog information. A final catalog is created based on the information that is input by the respective sellers, and is distributed to the respective sellers, for example, to be printed. However, when the sellers who use the conventional catalog continue to use the catalog, it is necessary to set each catalog of the sellers after each contract is over. As a result, the following problems have arisen. Namely, when the seller who uses the conventional catalog continues to use the catalog, it is necessary to set each catalog of the sellers after each contract is over. As a result, it takes time and effort to perform the setting. Further, in the event that a change is made, setting is performed again after the end of the contract, so that the conventional catalog cannot be used effectively. Still further, in the case where a change is made, it is necessary to perform setup again after the end of the contract, so that the conventional catalog cannot be used effectively. Still further, in the case where a change is made, it is necessary to perform setup

It has been suggested that axonal damage and loss occurs in the first stages of multiple sclerosis, suggesting an earlier diagnosis than the traditional magnetic resonance imaging of lesions in the brain, which depends on blood-brain barrier disruption. It was recently demonstrated that diffusion-weighted MRI and associated quantitative values (apparent diffusion coefficient, axial, radial and mean diffusivity) provide new information about the structural and pathological changes in the brains of multiple sclerosis patients. We measured these values in several regions, in subjects with relapsing-remitting and progressive multiple sclerosis, and investigated the correlation between diffusion-weighted imaging and standard MRI. We carried out a retrospective analysis of all the MRI examinations performed during the last 2 years in 25 patients with multiple sclerosis, comprising five cases with relapsing-remitting multiple sclerosis (RRMS) and 20 with progressive multiple sclerosis (SPMS).
