For patch 1.6 of Total War: Warlord series, the developers have taken inspiration. And its leader was the independent kingdom of Muscovy.The. Download Total War Warhammer (Steam). Empire Total War 1 Patch 1.5 Download.. First new Total War multiplayer game in 8 years arrives this August as Paradox. Empire: Total War Collection.Q: How to initialise an array of character pointers In C, how does one declare a char array of pointers without allocating memory for the pointers? I've tried the following: char *myArray = {'a', 'b'}; but I get an error: error: initializer element is not constant What's the proper way to do this? A: 'a' is a character literal. It is implicitly converted to the integer 0. Since it is not of integral type, it gets converted to pointer type. This is of course an invalid pointer. Instead of a character literal, use an integer constant. Since character literals evaluate to null pointers, you get the desired effect. char *myArray = {0, 'b'}; A: char * myArray = {'a', 'b'} is an initialization like char * myArray = "a"; The difference being that the first is an array initializer which does not accept constant expressions (as for example 0), whereas the second is a string literal. E.g. here is an array initializer: char myArray[] = {'a', 'b'}; A: To be more precise, the best way to declare an array of characters, is to do it as follows: char myArray[] = {'a', 'b'}; This declares a simple array of two characters. However, to explain to you why the first code snippet does not work as you expect it to work: In a declaration of a char array, there must be at least a "name", (a char* or a char array) and that (name) is the initializer. The compiler does not see the curly braces around the initializer, instead, it sees {'a', 'b'}, which is a valid constant expression. However, that constant expression is being converted to a pointer and in this case, it is a pointer to a constant. Since you are
