Phenol and some other electrophilic xenobiotics conjugate with glutathione and glutathione-S-transferases (GSTs) are important detoxification enzymes. GSTs are widespread and encode a variety of similar proteins. In the vertebrate lineage, two classes of GSTs have been discovered: cytosolic and nuclear. They show distinct genomic organizations, distinct functions, and are encoded by separate genes. We have recently described the discovery of the first two alpha-class GST genes in the cestode Paramphistomum sp. (gamma class) and the first cytoplasmic GST gene of the nematode Strongyloides stercoralis (beta class) in the phylum Nematoda. Here, we describe the discovery of two additional cytoplasmic GSTs in the long-tailed ray Florence (Bothriocephalus latus). The genes are organized into chromosomal clusters that appear to be orthologous to the vertebrate members. The gene sequences show a high degree of similarity, and the three-dimensional structures of the predicted proteins were almost identical. As expected for a gene family, the deduced amino acid sequences vary in amino acid identity (40-95%). The presence of alphafamilies in the phyla Cnidaria and Nematoda was confirmed. We propose that a common origin of the vertebrate alpha-class GSTs and the nematode and cestode beta- and gamma
