My wife has signed up for this marathon in NYC in 2013: The idea is that we'd like to train together for a marathon and I'm willing to do the uphill/hilly stuff (would have to learn how to run up a hill in a minute or two as that's generally what I've been doing the past year or so of running until now and that's a bit of a change). That said, the marathon distance is hilly because it goes through Central Park, uptown and midtown, and many of the inclines (if not all) are around 10-15% grade. The marathon route also passes over a section of the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge, with many small bridges in between, none of which were covered in the race maps I found online. Also, it goes a little over 1.5 miles before it heads into Central Park. The start line is at 7:00pm, which is late enough for me as I head to bed after a long day at work. My question is, can we do this? Will I be able to cover the distance at a sustainable pace without getting wrecked after the first mile or two? Will I have enough time to recover if/when I start to feel like I'm going to have a bonk? Are there specific drills I should do to prep for this? I'm only running 6 days a week and I am running on a relatively flat road on a treadmill where I can set incline at any time. I'd have to be able to set it to a 10-15% grade. I'm not looking to run with a heart rate monitor, but if it's the best option to
