◆ Do not confuse the game with Metal Gear Solid 3: Snake Eater. In this game the opponents are robots controlled by AI. The enemy robots do not reply to speech or obeys orders as in the Metal Gear Solid series. This is a heavy-gravity type of game. Being on a mission in a low-gravity environment gives you the feeling of being sucked into the ground. * "Naked Snake" is an alternate name for Naked Snake, who has the same form as in the Metal Gear Solid series. ◆ Very large robot for battle control. ◆ A new type of game for the series. ◆ If you find the control is not working, please contact us. Release Date: September 11, 2013Q: Can the passenger assume the pilot's position for a VFR takeoff? There's an example taken from the EAF (Eagle Airforrci's Flying Manual): Passenger should: take control of aircraft during the takeoff maneuver If the passenger is assigned by the airline to be one of the pilots: assume the pilots seat I've never been there, nor do I have an interest in landing at a place I'm unfamiliar with (could be dangerous), but is it safe for me as a passenger to assume the pilot's position if the pilot is incapacitated at takeoff? I do not anticipate myself striking the emergency procedures if the pilot is incapacitated as he is probably the last to hit the button. A: This question is a tad general, but this might get you going. No, you can't be the pilot. The pilot is the one who's ultimately in control of the aircraft during takeoff and landing, be it in company (pilot in command) or in the right seat (air traffic control pilot, tower). And the pilot is the one who signs off the takeoff and (if applicable) landing. There is no "passenger" in that decision process - it's not a passenger's decision. If the pilot is incapacitated, the only way to land the aircraft is via right seat control by air traffic control, and then the pilot in command can sign off the flight as landed. If the pilot in command is not incapacitated, he or she signs off the flight after the passenger has done so, and is the one who signs off the landing. You can not be the pilot because this is not a passenger-controlled c9d1549cdd
