In summary, our data suggests that the prevalence of TB infection in infants and children is high in China. The high prevalence of M. tuberculosis in HIV-infected infants and children could contribute to TB deaths in this age group. HIV-infected children were more susceptible to and at greater risk of developing TB infection. Therefore, it is important that children with known HIV-infection receive TB preventive therapy. The most common strategy to control access to a computer system or network of computers is use of a login screen. A user requesting access to a computer system or network of computers is typically asked to input a password (if the computer system or network of computers is password protected), then the computer system or network of computers grants or denies access depending on whether the password is correct. In addition, in order to prevent unauthorized users from obtaining access to the computer system or network of computers, it is common to limit the access to the computer system or network of computers by requiring each user to specify a level of access that the user wishes to obtain. For example, a user might be required to specify whether the user would like to be able to access a Web site on the Internet, only connect to the Web site, or connect to the Web site and request information. Existing approaches to providing such user login/access control require the installation of relatively costly and complicated security products to protect computer systems and networks. For example, the user login/access control of an existing computer system or network of computers is usually configured by specifying an access level for each user at the computer system or network of computers and using an access control server to grant or deny access to the computer system or network of computers depending on whether the user is authenticated and the access level for the user that is specified. The access control server is also required to authenticate users and track the authorization level of the users who access the computer system or network of computers. Such user login/access control systems tend to be very expensive and difficult to maintain, and do not lend themselves easily to scaling the number of users permitted to access the computer system or network of computers. WO 2004/096513 by McCarthy, et al. discloses a system for controlling access to a computer system or network of computers. This system comprises a domain controller that is communicatively coupled to a plurality of user access terminals via a local area network, and a gateway device communicatively coupled to the domain controller. The gateway device is also communicatively coupled to a remote authentication server via a wide area network. The remote authentication server is configured to receive encrypted information from a user access terminal, and to authenticate the user access terminal with the domain controller based on the encrypted information. The gateway device is configured to decrypted the information that is authenticatated with the domain controller and to route the information to the domain controller. The domain controller is configured to authenticate the user access terminal and to create a security
