Dynamic simulation of the space environment using co-added data. Tests of the effects of space radiation on electronics have used laboratory data recorded in the space environment. However, the tests are typically limited to the spacecraft data, ignoring the co-added data used in routine operations of satellites and other spacecraft. The work presented here shows that the co-added data could be effectively used to predict spacecraft operations in the space environment. Co-added data have been used as a model to predict the number of firings of a nuclear thermal rocket engine for operations in low earth orbit. The predicted particle fluences in ground-track ground-point measurements at the rocket test site match the measured data within 10%.

Q: Why are infinity symbols used for infinite series? I know the infinity symbols  $\infty$  are used to denote an infinite series of numbers that begin repeating. I also know that there are positive and negative infinity symbols. What I don't understand is why it is always written as  $\infty$  not  $\infty_0$  or  $\infty_+$ , etc. Wouldn't  $\infty_+$  be a more correct notation? A: The reason is as follows: If you want to write a positive infinity as in  $\infty_+$  then you have to distinguish it from the other positive infinity, the algebraic one. Another option for the notation would be the  $\infty$ -form. But using that would be misleading. Risk stratification of ED development in children with type 1 diabetes: the value of daily glycemic variability and a 5-year prospective study. The purpose of this study was to compare the conventional models of diabetes care in predicting risk of ED and explore whether measures of glycemic variability could enhance risk stratification. In this 5-year prospective study, 95 children with Type 1 diabetes mellitus aged 7.7 +/- 4.3 years were followed. Peripheral neuropathy was defined as non-optimal glycemic control (HbA1c  $\geq$  7.5%) and/or at least 1 foot/leg ulcer or neuropathic symptom, and end-stage neuropathy was defined as non-optimal glycemic control, of which at least 1 foot/leg ulcer or neuropathic symptom, and the inability to walk, with or without the need for help. Logistic regression was used to analyze the probability of developing ED in relation to glycemic variability and risk factors of established predictive value. The prevalence of ED was 6.8% (n = 6) in the follow-up period. The highest probability of developing ED was found in children with "ulcer and foot ulcer" (Odds Ratio (OR) 18.4 (95%CI 2.2-154.7) versus 2.2 (95% CI 0.9-5.2) in those without ulcers). In addition, the highest OR (7.3 (95%CI 2.0-25.9)) was found in children with "diabetic kidney disease" (DKI). The absence of DKI conferred an OR of 2.1 (95%CI 0.4-11.3). Neither poor glycemic control nor episodes of hypoglycemia were associated with ED development. Glycemic variability did not influence ED development. The presence of
