They don't need to "sign into" to work. This means that you don't need to type in your internet password to access the internet and its sites, and we are not asking for your credit card information. Instead, we are asking for your phone number. This is because our internet sites need the ability to text and call you. Imagine the security benefits: if your phone number wasn't required, no one could call or text you from our sites. Now if you get spammed, you get to report it. But if you get spammed from some other sources, you won't get to report it to us. You are not simply signing up for an account, you are signing up for a life-long communication channel with the world's leading networking company. Asking for your phone number is a nuisance Actually, we really don't think of it as a nuisance at all. But when you think about it, it does seem like we're asking a lot of you. While we understand that it's an inconvenience to give out your phone number to a website, we assure you that our sites would be very insecure without it.Q: How to find a range in excel I have a list of email addresses.
