But does this real thing live up to the ethereal hype? Is it really the next step in the evolution of wearable technology? Read the tea leaves or what you will, but to me it seems that if Apple ever does deliver a smartwatch, it will be a modest, low-profile accessory and not a transformative device. And in January, the Apple-connected iPod Nano was unveiled and the concept of a dedicated wearable device became much more mainstream. In more than 30 years of covering the electronic gadgets that are the bane of my existence, the smartwatch is the most interesting, forward-thinking wearable device I have ever covered. It's obviously not the first device to try to tie in to your phone, which is where I really feel smartwatches start to get interesting. It
