For many, it is a lively asset of comedy. For others, it is the nemesis of it. For some, it is an empty (perhaps hollow) and empty (perhaps empty) thing to hear and see in a show. For the few that have found a solid way to utilize, they can have an absolute impact. The audience and the characters are in a constant struggle for superiority over each other and that struggle is entertaining as hell. One of my favorite forms of comedy is modern comedy. The main reasons for this are that it possesses it's own set of rules and it's an interesting and sophisticated art form. For a comedy to be good, it must be able to intrigue the audience with the things they do not understand. The modern comedian must find a way to subvert the regular or the common belief structure into something that the audience must ponder over and laugh about. This can be done in a comedic style like Jerry Seinfeld's or Richard Lewis', which can be hard to mimic without making the audiences feel like they are outsiders in their own social circle. Here are some examples of modern comedies. The Office: After watching the series, it is obvious that the main character is extremely self-conscious and needs validation for most of the story lines. So what better way to remedy this than to have an office where the employees have to act like they are trying to make a point on the screen. It is only by the end that you begin to see why the main character is upset. Private Practice: This is one of the best modern comedies, in which each episode takes place in a unique setting and the actors are forced to adapt to the setting they are in (648931e174
