Netflix is now offering its own smart TVs. Bloomberg reports that the streamer is set to launch a version of its interface running on a select line of partners' premium offerings. One of the companies on board is TCL, which is currently shipping TVs that run Google's Android TV. That could make Netflix's existing approach to streaming look a bit redundant, but it's still a bit early to speculate on exactly what's happening on these devices. As for what the smart TVs might actually stream — those seem to be up in the air. Netflix is entering into an agreement with Samsung, TCL, and Hisense in a bid to offer its service on the televisions from those companies. That includes TCL TVs for Americans, as well as versions made by Hisense for European users. The catch is that all those partners are separate from the manufacturer that makes the TVs, meaning they're not actually sharing the same hardware. If things go as planned, the Netflix interface could go a long way toward personalizing the experience. Users could pick between versions of Netflix that stream movies, TV, and shows, and use different input methods (like voice) for specific streaming sessions. That's the sort of personalization that
