Despite the increasing use of the Internet as a patient education tool for many health conditions, little is known about the patterns of use by patients when seeking drug information on the Internet. The objective of this study is to examine the type of drug information that is received by patients via the Internet and whether this information affects patients' decisions regarding drug use. The main hypothesis to be tested is that patients will receive drug information that is more relevant to their condition than information provided in the traditional media (i.e., mass media). To test this hypothesis, a qualitative study using the Internet for information acquisition will be conducted. Patients who are Internet users for other purposes will be recruited and asked to participate. Data will be collected using an Internet survey, focus groups, and analysis of patient postings on discussion boards and their responses to a drug-oriented question 6d1f23a050
