the attack was the first large scale hacking in the field of web security. it involved a combination of social engineering, phishing, and spear phishing. as the ceo of the company, i was the target of a spear phishing email. it is interesting to note that if a high level individual at a company is targeted, it does not only indicate a higher risk of an attack, but it also opens up a huge area for social engineering attacks. in my case, an email was sent to me containing a link to an attachment of a word document that would install a malicious program on my computer. if the attachment had been opened, i would have been infected with a trojan horse. the attack was so sophisticated that even if i had not opened the attachment, the malicious software that was installed would have created a back door that could have been used by the attacker to gain remote access to my computer. the attacker was able to install multiple malware programs, including a remote access trojan, a key logger, and a password stealer. all of these programs were used to try to gain control over my company's computer network. during the attack, the attacker had access to both the internal and external network and could have viewed all of the traffic to and from the company's network. while it is certainly possible to use an antivirus scanner to detect and remove malware, this is not the best approach. it can be very challenging for a user to remove malware from the system. it is often a better idea to run an antivirus scan on a regular basis, so that you have regular (and hopefully quick) access to an antivirus scanner.
