He died an innocent victim. Captain Nicholas Wilde, noble captain in the Royal Navy, is killed in a clash with pirates whilst attempting to rescue the daughter of an old friend. At the funeral, the only two survivors are a local buccaneer and a midshipman, Jack Hawkins. One suspects that it was this last encounter that pushed the rest of the crew insane and led to their suicide. The remaining events transpire during a stay at a mysterious island. A rich heiress flirts with Hawkins, and when he falls in love with her, he is finally able to confirm the veracity of his suspicions about the buccaneers lifestyle. But fear not, the pirates are by no means finished off, and many will survive to wreak havoc. So what kind of a box-office success is this film likely to attract? It fits a current trend in certain quarters of Hollywood. There is quite an effort to make films that are akin to the wildlife documentaries of BBC. We live in a very diverse and multicultural world but too few of us seem to want to associate with the world of other people. No wonder there is a push to return to nature movies where we can identify with those who are different from us. Danish produced, and set in Paris, this Netflix original is a nighttime rom-com that pairs two old friends and how their lives intersect in old age. It's a feel-good story with a bit of a gut-wrenching turn, especially for the male audience. The plot involves snooping wife, sleep, stock options, and many more. But, like all good things in French films, it's played for laughs, and more importantly, it's the perfect age-appropriate film for older people who watch Netflix. Movies made for older viewers should be on Netflix. It makes good sense for the audience and the advertiser. The movie is set in an urban neighborhood at night, with plenty of comings and goings. If you love drinking, eating and being in Paris, this is the one for you.
