The quality of your work and output is going to be only as good as the design. We'll now take you through the process of creating a professional-quality web banner from scratch in Adobe Photoshop. As you can see, the Mask influence is the best when working on a portrait, and the background influence is best when you are working on a graphic background. Of course, artists like to use the black blend to clean up the image, especially artwork like the structure you see here, and that's partly because black has limited influences. Yellow is great for artwork like this, whereas a more neutral color can have a nice sharpening influence on a photograph, particularly for artworks that are original and don't have a lot of structure. Honestly, I actually usually go into both tools to override the properties I want and get the final look I want. For example, in the screen here, an Auto Mask that's with the black blend brings out the detail and the muted colors are still under the image, and being able to have that cool black at the edges of the photo helps me bring this image to life. While the public beta only supports PSD files at the moment, we're building the capability to open and work with raw image, video, and audio files, as well as toolsets available from both Adobe and third-party service providers. With the need for additional file formats to be supported on web applications connecting to Photoshop, new toolsets are currently being built from the ground up. File formats such as core image files, webp, and WebM right now are being worked on to be made available to web applications.

Photoshop tools can seem very simple at first glance. However, through the wide variety of features which can be found in the plethora of menus, and the more complicated actions involved, when it comes to some of the most advanced features such as the Adjustment Layers, Gradients, and even the Layer Styles, you can often find yourself needing to tinker to get the results you're looking for.
