There is a new flat/bordered mode (flat) that allows for easy and quick trimming. There are three new editing modes: Distort, Smart Frame and Smooth. Smart Frame crops the image to given dimensions and also fixes red-eye in the process. This is particularly useful as you don't need to make separate adjustments; you can crop, straighten and fix red-eye all in one step. You also get the option to set a "Remember My Settings" for Smart Frame. We found it a bit funny when Lightroom began digging into an old photo and replacing the "missing" family pet with a different dog. But it's not a totally new feature, as it was first introduced with version 4 of Lightroom. This time around, it shows up at the bottom of the main window when you work on photos that are saved in "Permanent Web". We also found it easier than before to create new collections for images. This is because collections are now independent and can be expanded without affecting other collections. That turns out to be a useful change as you can break larger collections into small subgroups. I won't go into all the new and updated functionality which considerably expanded the capabilities of Lightroom. Instead, we will see some of the ways in which this useful, if expensive, tool is no longer useful for new users. In particular, I will touch on the five new features which, in my opinion, make Lightroom less useful in this day and age. The first new feature that I'll look at is the addition of a new workflow to manage large groups of images. After you import a folder into Lightroom, you can assign it a new name and create a let's say "Birthday Party 2016" collection as a base. Now all your birthdays are saved here. Then you can create custom collections for other parties and year-end projects.

You can apply filters to your photos as you edit them. These filters give your images a special effect and are great for adding drama, enhancing a specific area of a photo, or helping you work with a specific lighting condition.
