In C, you can write a function like this: float *f(int x) { / return x[0], x[1],... */ } And from Python, you call it as: int *x = [1, 2, 3, 4] x = f(x) print x But if I try to call this from Python, I get a MemoryError. How do you get around this? EDIT: The reason I want to do this is so I can call arbitrary functions from C, and thus get away from using C modules. A: Assuming you have a C library with a header file in it, you can use the ctypes module to write a wrapper function to the C function. There's a good tutorial at For your specific example, if your C library has a header file named 'foo.h' with the following function declared in it: float *f(int *x); And you have Python code in the file 'foo.py' which you want to call: import ctypes foo = ctypes.CD
