After the latest confusion over storing Syrian and Iraqi refugees on American soil, France has announced plans to slow the flow of refugees into Europe while the majority of the Europeans turn away refugees at borders. France has slashed the number of refugees it accepts, and said it will suspend all resettlement agreements with Syria and Iraq until the end of the year. Additionally, France is closing its ports to the rescue ship, MSF La Ligue, which has been rescuing refugees in the Mediterranean since the beginning of October. La Ligue has rescued 3,723 refugees from war-torn Syria and the Middle East; the last rescue mission was canceled earlier this week. The announcement of the gradual slowdown in the flow of refugees comes after France announced last month that it would also slow the pace of accepting asylum seekers. This past Friday, the French government announced it would shut down its three processing centers in Italy, Greece, and Hungary. "France will progressively reduce the number of refugees admitted in the second half of the year. This will be done in order to prepare the economy and health care system for the absorption of new arrivals," a government official said in a statement. French Interior Minister Bernard Cazeneuve said the country will "give some reprieve to those who are already in France." "This will allow us to better manage the situation before the end of the year when the flow of migrants arrives to a critical point," Cazeneuve said in a statement. In June, the United States announced it would accept 10,000 Syrian refugees fleeing the ongoing war. In response to the United States announcement, German Chancellor Angela Merkel stressed that the U.S. should accept more refugees. "Europe has already done a lot to help people and we, the Europeans, must also do more to protect refugees," Merkel told The Guardian.
