Q: Read data from a website (which holds the data) using Python 3.5 I would like to be able to read a text file which contains data from a website. This should be pretty easy, given Python 3.5 has urllib3.urlopen() and pretty soon we should have it in requests. Does anyone have any suggestion on which module or library should I use for this purpose? A: To read a csv file, use the built-in csv module. If you want to read http pages, use the built-in http.client module. As for reading the contents of a website, either you make an HTTP request yourself, or you open a file on disk and read it. The built-in csv module or the built-in http client would allow you to do the first, but for the second you'd need to learn a little about json or xml. { "name": "", "css_prefix_text": "icon-", "css_use_suffix": false, "hinting": true, "units_per_em": 1000, "ascent": 850, "glyphs": [{ "id": "node-down", "x": -16, "y": -12, "width": 64, "height": 16, "info": { "editor_id": "node-down",
